

This abstract was prepared for an invited oral presentation at the symposium on “Nuclear Synthesis to Environmental Science: 50 Years in Actinide Science,” at the 223rd ACS National Meeting to be held in Orland, FL, U.S.A., from April 7-11, 2002.

Prepared: November 13, 2001

Heino Nitsche

University of California, Department of Chemistry, Berkeley, CA 94720, and Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory, The Glenn T. Seaborg Center, Berkeley, CA 94720, USA.

Gregory R. Choppin and the speciation of actinides

Greg Choppin's scientific career covers a wide span of achievements that include the discovery of actinide elements, nuclear waste reprocessing chemistry, and nuclear environmental chemistry, to name only a few.

This talk will present an overview of Professor Choppin's important influence on the field of speciation of actinides in many research areas.